The website will be the central communications point for the Council’s work in addition to serving as a central clearinghouse for state and national early childhood programs, policy, and research. The Early Childhood Advisory Council is charged with creating a high quality, coordinated system of services to support early childhood development in the state.

“In its first five months, the Early Childhood Advisory Council has laid the groundwork to become an invaluable asset to our state and youth,” Gov. Tomblin said. “Through this website, the Council will be able to collaborate and coordinate with local communities and stakeholders so that our children receive the best education foundation possible.”

Chaired by Cabinet Secretary Kay Goodwin, the Early Childhood Advisory Council consists of representatives from many key groups including the Department of Education, The Higher Education Policy Commission, The Division of Early Care and Education, Head Start, WV Birth to Three, In-home family education, and the business community.

“There is already tremendous work taking place in all arenas of early childhood development,” Chair Goodwin said. “This Council will highlight both our state’s strengths as well as help to bring a renewed focus to those areas where improvement is still needed.”
